The Missing Chapter of Walden

Last week curators at the Concord Museum in Concord, Massachusetts, were cleaning out the attic when they opened an old trunk and found the original manuscript of Henry David Thoreau's classic work, Walden. Scholars were ecstatic to have a chance to see Thoreau's own handwriting and to analyze his revisions.

Both curators and scholars were startled, however, to discover an entire chapter of Walden that no one had ever seen before. They knew it had to be his, partly because they recognized his handwriting, but also partly by the style of the chapter:

- It focuses on nature.
- It uses long, complex sentences and sophisticated language.
- It includes references to Greek and Roman mythology and ancient history.
- The chapter begins by describing a specific scene in nature. It continues by adding more detail to the description, and it ends by making a connection between nature, human life, and possibly the Oversoul.
- It includes a philosophical discussion of something related to the scene.

Your task is to produce that missing chapter. Find or invent a scene from nature. Elaborate on it and then make a connection to life. Plan to write a minimum of 500 words.
